America and England.

It is a poor rule that will not work both ways. The British government thinks it right and proper to make representations to the American state department respecting changes which the British government thinks should be by Massachusetts, with some made in American laws in order modification, of the English expeto punish as crimes acts done in dient of a permanent law office atthe United States to promote tached to the legislature, which great changes in the political tie shall have the oversight of the which binds Ireland to the British draft of all new legislation. England-Liberals or Conservatives, Whigs or Tories-could bring about peace and good government in Ireland, the United States might amicably agree to put up a while longer with these vexations and annoyances. But there really seems to be no hope of this. With few exceptions, the party leaders in the House of Commons talk and act about Irish affairs more like a lot of self-sufficient, arrogant, incapable and panie-stricken landlords than like thoughtful, able and deliberate legislators. What would the average Englishman say and do about such a condition of things in any other country as now exists and has so long existed in Ireland? What was there in the former condition of the Ionian Islands, or of Austrian Italy, or of Naples, or of the Papal States, or of Poland, to justify the interference of the British public, if not the British government, a counterpart of which cannot be found in the pres-
